JUST FOOD?

Unjust terms of trade affect the food we eat and the people who produce it, not only in the developing world but also here at home.

In both rich and poor countries, the poor are malnourished. In the rich countries, people pay a smaller and smaller percentage of income for more and more calories, often without proper nutrition; in the poor countries, they pay a higher and higher percentage of income for fewer and fewer calories.

In response to the global food crisis that these imbalances threaten to produce, apparently incompatible movements have emerged – one to develop fair trade and trade justice internationally, and one to favour products that are produced and sold ethically locally.

BUT ARE THEY REALLY INCOMPATIBLE?

JUST FOOD? INCLUDES:

SUE BRANFORD (GRAIN)

Sue is a journalist with particular interest in land and environmental problems, and Latin America.

KATH DALMENY (SUSTAIN)

Policy director with a special interest in food, sustainability and climate change and in local food systems.

JUST FOOD? WORKSHOPS

Including cookery demonstrations from Jedd Hayward and a fair trade simulation workshop from Claire Plumb of Leicester Masaya Link Group.

STALLS

From sellers of ethical food and organisations focusing on issues of sustainability and fairness in food.
